the 1990s, the number of people with a disability has increased in all countries. In the United States, the number of people with a disability has increased from 35 million in 1980 to 55 million in 2000 (U.S. Census Bureau, 2000). In the United Kingdom, the number of people with a disability has increased from 5.5 million in 1990 to 7.5 million in 2000 (Department of Health, 2000).

There are a number of reasons for this increase. One of the main reasons is the increase in life expectancy. As people live longer, they are more likely to develop a disability. Another reason is the increase in the number of people who are injured or become disabled as a result of accidents or violence. A third reason is the increase in the number of people who are born with a disability.

The increase in the number of people with a disability has led to a number of challenges for society. One of the main challenges is the need for more accessible services and facilities. Another challenge is the need for more support and care for people with a disability. A third challenge is the need for more education and training for people with a disability.

There are a number of ways in which society can address these challenges. One way is to improve accessibility. Another way is to provide more support and care. A third way is to provide more education and training.

It is important that we all work together to address these challenges. Only then can we ensure that everyone has the opportunity to live a full and active life.

The following are some of the ways in which we can address these challenges:

- Improve accessibility
- Provide more support and care
- Provide more education and training

By working together, we can ensure that everyone has the opportunity to live a full and active life.
